COHPA Faculty and Staff:

The Urban Innovation and New Media Task force is collecting feedback on the three draft organizational structures which are attached to this email.

The three approaches include:

1) a two-college approach that organizes only programs slated to relocate to the downtown campus into two new colleges.

2) an integrated approach that creates one new college with programs from the College of Health and Public Affairs and Nicholson School of Communication on the downtown campus. This approach also includes relocating programs from the School of Visual Arts and Design and Education downtown, but retaining their reporting relationships to the College of Arts and Humanities and College of Education and Human Performance, respectively.

3) a “big idea” approach that organizes one new college around education, communication, social innovation, public service and community impact. This approach creates a new college that has units that are located on both the main campus and downtown campus, but are connected around advancing societal change.

Please remember, these approaches:

- recommend potential organizational structures and do not reflect phasing of when programs would relocate downtown
- show programs that may also be considered by the Academic Health Sciences Center Task Force
- are draft recommendations, with feedback still being gathered and vetted by the task force.
Collecting Feedback
As a member of the UINM task force I have been asked to provide feedback on each recommendation. To help gather this information, I am asking anyone in the college who would like to provide me with the strengths, weaknesses, and unintended consequences of each of the three approaches listed above by email. Please send this information to Barbara Conner at barbara.conner@ucf.edu

Please provide all feedback by noon on Tuesday, Nov. 28. Responses will be shared and discussed at the Nov. 30 Task Force Meeting.
